GreenLeap News:

Japanese Developing Energy Water Generator...

A Japanese university is developing a new technology that would both produce electricity and desalinate seawater. The new process exploits the temperature difference between the ocean's surface and its depths. Specifically, it brings cold seawater from the deep to the surface -- where the water warms and releases ammonia gas, which then drives an energy generator. Following that, the same water moves to a low pressure chamber where it is boiled. The ensuing evaporation then condenses and is collected to be used for public consumption as fresh water. In addition, the new system is environmentally safe and creates potable water at a cost comparable to those found in more traditional water distribution systems. Some Pacific island nations and Saudi Arabia have expressed a strong interest in the university's program, since these regions often experience long periods of seasonal drought.
